StarWatch By Gary Becker - Judging Geomagnetic Activity

The wonderful auroral storm that blanketed the cloudy East Coast on the evening and morning of May 10-11, 2024, sparked my interest in these phenomena. Travel plans to visit Iceland in late September of 2024 had already been finalized, and they were very successful in terms of recording activity. Ironically after returning from Iceland, action spiked on the evening of Thursday, October 10, during the time I was in class with my Moravian students. My department chair, Dr. Kelly Kriebel, was observing me that evening and the lesson could not have proceeded in a more spontaneous manner. Aware of the possibility of an auroral outbreak, I started the class with a 15-minute photo essay of my trip and then discussed the possibility of an imminent display that evening, with showing my class why this might be the case. Finally, I promised that we would end the lesson a little early to go upstairs to the SkyDeck to see if any activity was occurring. I had no sooner switched gears to my focus topic, when front-row learner, Gavin Labbadia, waved his cell phone in my direction and excitedly exclaimed, "This is what my mom just texted me." It was a stunning image of red auroral curtains happening at that moment over Northampton County. Gavin's mother lived about four miles from the University. So much for the lesson! We proceeded to the SkyDeck, and even through the star-canceling light pollution of center city Bethlehem, the sky was red with auroral action. Check out (Wildman) Jesse Leayman's photo essay of the October 10 event, imaged from just south of Bethlehem. * Southeastern PA is an improbable location for viewing the northern lights, so what are the indicators that best describe when we might see a display? Begin with a wonderful application, spaceweatherlive, and its web sidekick, https://spaceweatherlive.com, which devotes all of its attention to auroral phenomena. Using the smartphone app., which I recommend over the website, the first parameter to be noted is the Kp index. It is a combined measurement of Earth's horizontal magnetic field over the past three hours... Read more at www.astronomy.org
