Because Heeren was not physically present at the originally scheduled sentencing hearing and could not respond to the allegations, Fisher gave both the defense and the prosecution two weeks to submit written arguments before reconvening on Thursday morning. As the first major order of business, the judge ruled that the juror's identity was no longer protected and is a matter of public record, and Hunter and Heeren then took turns making their cases verbally. In his argument, Hunter cited the precedent of a murder case titled State v. Weber when social media activity between a juror and the victim's stepmother was called into question, and he recounted specifically asking during the selection process whether any of the prospective jurors knew the attorneys on either side. Hunter described the failure to disclose the friendship before it was discovered ahead of sentencing as "a miscarriage of justice" and a violation of the defendant's Constitutional rights.

In response, Heeren

on Facebook and not have the type of relationship that people traditionally have as friends," Fisher said.

Thus, the judge declined to grant the request for a new trial and proceeded to sentencing on both counts, but he did sustain Hunter's objection to entering the news article into the record. Heeren asked the court not to follow the recommendation of a deferred judgment in the presentence investigation because he felt the crime, which resulted in about $18,000 worth of damage to the library, was not only a property crime but a crime against the children who were at the library on that day. "I cannot imagine being those kids in the situation they were in, finding themselves in front of police officers, testifying in court, the whole thing, and it was all orchestrated by the defendant. She's the one that somehow got those kids in the situation where she was able to do what she did. She wanted to tear up the library herself, but she knew she couldn't do that. And so she had the kids do it in her place," Heeren said. "I'm not sure what happened that the defendant was able to get herself into a position of trust and authority that she was able to orchestrate the destruction of the Elberon Library and have those children do it for her... The defendant basically used these children, and she used them for her own purposes. She wanted to get back at the library board and the city of Elberon for whatever reason, and she did it using the children. That is something that is very serious. I'm not sure what the lasting repercussions are gonna be for these kids."

He commended the children for coming forward and taking responsibility for their actions, but he believed they would suffer from a long-term stigma as they grow up in the small community. Heeren asked the court for a fiveyear prison sentence on each count running concurrently and a minimum fine, though he wasn't sure what facility Jenkins, who is transgender, should be required to report to.

Conversely, Hunter argued that it was indeed only a property crime and the result of emotions running high for both Jenkins and the children, and he described the defendant as "a good person who made a bad decision."

She did not stop them from doing anything. She may have opened the door and (it) looks like that they went in and were able to get things. We maintain that she was not trying to assist them or solicit them to do that, but the jury found otherwise," he said.

He called Jenkins a perfect candidate for a deferred judgment, and Hunted also characterized the children as "good kids who made a bad decision." He urged the court to ignore suggestions of uncharged crimes and to instead focus on rehabilitation and the future with further counseling as opposed to a maximum sentence for a first offense as

The defendant was then allowed to address the court herself and took responsibility for "letting (her) emotions control (her) response to the situation."

"In a moment where I should have risen to meet the challenge, I instead shut down. That failure of judgment weighs on me still, and my memories of that day play on repeat because of the role I played; not because I intended harm, but because I let myself stop leading when the situation demanded it most," Jenkins said. "That said, I have not and I will not let that moment define me. I've taken
